D. LEARNING OUTCOMES (General)

1. Students will learn how social movements contend with issues of social inequality and oppression through the use of organized and sustained public activism.
2. Students will learn how sociologists study social movements.
3. Students will learn how social movements frame their perspectives on social problems to the public and to power-elites, and how they communicate these collective action frames using both old media and new technologies.
4. Students will learn how (and why) some social movement organizations turn to violence as a mechanism for liberation (i.e., The Black Panther Party, Earth Liberation Front, etc.) and the outcome of using violence as a tactic.
5. Students will learn how a vast array of theoretical perspectives (resource mobilization, structural strain, political opportunity structure, relative deprivation, new social movement theory, etc.) can shed light on why some movements emerge and are sustained for the long-term, while others meet with quick failure.
6. Students will learn how social movements come to select their repertoire of protest tactics (from letter writing campaigns and boycotts, to marches and hunger strikes).
7. Students will learn how sociologists assess and evaluate successes and failures of social movement organizations.
8. Students will learn how the Civil Rights and Women's Movements have both had an indelible influence on every social movement that came after (such as the New American Right, GLBT Liberation, the Environmental Movement, BLM, and the Global Justice Movement).
